Are You a Trader or an Investor?

As OSF and Mando describe throughout the Crypto Academy Sessions series, one of the key questions every investor has to answer on their crypto journey is whether they're a trader, an investor, or both.

And in this wide-ranging discussion, Mark Ritchie II, managing partner of RTM Capital Advisors, tackles the many angles of that exact question to find that, to some extent, we're all traders — even the long-term HODLers among us.

Through trial and error, the help of mentors, and the study of market history, Mark says we can all develop a process that best fits your own style. The key is figuring out what exactly that process entails, how to discover and efficiently process information, and which assets you can use to put your portfolio in the best possible position.

This interview is market agnostic, but whether you're trading NFTs or simply dollar cost averaging for the long-term, understanding why you make decisions and where you have blind spots will help improve your bottom line.

The High-Priestess of Memes and Dickbutts

And who better to follow a Nobel laureate than Coinshares head of strategy Meltem Demirors. As the title suggests, there is perhaps no one more plugged into the world of pixels, jpegs, and memes — so many memes — than Meltem.

In this episode of Adventures in Crypto, she sits down with Raoul Pal to discuss the serious power of memes in this digital age, how cultural phenomena drive everything on the internet, and why crypto ultimately comes down to the power of the people.

Meltem also shares her journey from the oil business to crypto, and she and Raoul cover everything from L1s, L2s, and the debate of centralization versus decentralization.

If you've ever wondered why something called CryptoDickbutts holds value, this is the episode for you.
